New Drama at Cohan Theatre Is Earnest Rather Than Dully Serions.

"A Bill of Divorcement," in which Charles Dillingham brought back Allan Pollock, English actor, to this hotbed of culture at the George M. Cohan Theatre last night after an absence of seven years, started realistically before any one had spoken a line with the chine of Christimas bells that were so beautifully modulated they never once suggested a stage hand bangine tubes with more vigor than talent. They rang so sweetly through the first act that one wanted them again and again, preferring them even to a troupe of Swiss vaudeville.

The German piece had its merits and The German plece had its merits and those who saw them applauded warmly. But then again there was something about it that brought ill suppressed laughs, which is hardly what a tragedy is supposed to do. Maybe the laughter was at the idea of so much emotion compressed into the lives of the Elder Brother, the Younger Brother and the Sister, who, by the way, are fully grown children. Or it might have been at the frenzied way Phillips Tead, Sidney Carlyle and Miss Nedda Harrigan put the emotion across. At any rate there was a catch somewhere.

The play concerns the horror of the children at discovering that their mother, while their father is out chopping wood while their father is out chopping wood to be some the children at discovering that their mother, while their father is out chopping wood to be some the constant of the children at discovering that their mother, while their father is out chopping wood to be some the constant of the constant of the children at discovering that their mother, while their father is out chopping wood to be constant of the constant of the constant of the children at discovering that their mother, while their father is out chopping wood to be constant of the constant of the constant of the children at discovering that their mother.
